CARMEL-ON-THE-SEA, is a very interesting spot, where one can find much that is worth seeing. The scenery is beautiful, and the climate is favorable for travel. The town is situated on a hill overlooking the Pacific Ocean, and the surrounding country is very fertile. The vicinity is quite a hotbed of soulful culture, and has a vortex of erotic erudition.

BY WILLARD HUNTINGTON WRIGHT.

Los Angeles Times (1886-1922); May 22, 1910; ProQuest Central pg. II1

The Carmelites' Picnic on Point Lobos.

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner. Further reproduction prohibited without permission.
P.S.—There is a barber in Carmel, but I hear he has an independent income.

THE CARMEITES.

The Carmelites include a great many well-known writers and artists, as well as many great writers and artists who hope to be well known. In this way the Carmelites will have the unique advantage of being able to wear the same clothes as the rest of the people. The Carmelites are not afraid to show their solid worth, and the world will respect them for it. In fact, they have the right to feel proud of their achievements. The Carmelites are a rare breed of men and women, and they will always be remembered by their contemporaries.

Upton Sinclair, as he’s seen at lunch.

Mary Austin, walking through the pine woods.

George Sterling, in a most unpoleole position.

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner. Further reproduction prohibited without permission.